Rosé style wines are a celebration of youth, the summer season, and embracing the moment. These dry wines of various pinks lead with bouquets of ripe strawberry and tea, and finish with a touch of salt and sweet-tart acidity. Today we are showcasing three distinct style of rosé for you: Sparkling old-world, delicate new world, and (our favorite) a complex powerhouse from Austria.

In the garden our bursting beds and historic orchard are alive with color and textures. Be sure to look out for edible plants, like Kale, mixed in with traditional plantings.

Inspired by the amazing horticultural team here at Newfields, we've chosen a group of wines that exhibit a whimsical collection of aromas that you might find in a garden shed. Grassy sauvignon blanc, petrol-laden German Riesling, and earthy Italian red exhibit peculiar and intriguing aromas that remind one of the garden. Can't wait 'til summer garden season is back!

Until then, our horticulturists are busy reordering plants and designing new or refreshing old garden beds. On your visit to The Garden this winter or early spring, you are likely to see them deinstalling Winterlights, pruning trees and shrubs, or preparing new spaces for the upcoming seasons.

While we think of things as belonging to one side of the Atlantic or the other, this flight helps us consider how much the two sides share. While wines like Napa Valley cabernet sauvignon, Oregon pinot noir, and Argentine Malbec are staples of the New World, all these grapes originate from Europe and have only relatively recently found their stride in American soils.

Many great American painters spent significant time in Europe, crossing the Atlantic to study and create. Exquisite paintings by William Scott, John Singer Sargent, and James Abbott McNeill Whistler have made the journey back across the pond. Go check them out in our American galleries on this floor.

Inspired by both traditional and contemporary designs in our galleries, this flight invites you to the edges of how smoke can influence a beverage. Single malt scotch whisky is a classic example of smoke in beverage. The flavor comes from the peat that is often burned to heat the grains before the fermentation. Rauchbier is a beer that is made from grains that have been dried using smoke. Mezcal is a spirit made from agave plants that are cooked in a fire pit before distillation, imparting a strong smoky flavor.

In our Design Gallery, look for the works of Maarten Baas and Maria Martinez. Although these artists are from different generations, and worked in different mediums on separate continents, they are united by their use of fire and smoke to achieve a desired appearance.

France is to wine as China is to tea. Over the centuries, French grape growers and wine makers have harnessed the soil and climate of Champagne, Burgundy, and Bordeaux to produce some of world's finest wines. Champagne gave us the first sparkling wine, which is a white wine made from lightly pressed white and red grapes. In Burgundy, the Cistercian monastic tradition elevated the native Pinot Noir grape to produce wine for sacramental use. Bordeaux produces long-lived, powerful red wines, and is the home of the most-planted grape in the world: Cabernet Sauvignon, a hybrid of Cabernet Franc and Sauvignon Blanc.
